The Creativity and innovation competency describes a person's capacity to develop new and original ideas. High scorers are likely to approach work tasks in an innovative, creative manner and consider alternatives to conventional approaches.

Leveraging Strengths and Development Suggestions

Motivation and Stressors

You see yourself as highly ambitious and very comfortable striving towards difficult targets and goals. This has likely helped you achieve many things in your life so far and should help you achieve many more. However, making overly ambitious goals may sometimes be unrealistic and setting yourself up for disappointment if you find you cannot achieve those goals. When setting new goals, try to consider the timeframe and resources you might need to achieve those goals and whether it is too much more than what you think you can achieve comfortably.

Being a highly innovative person, you are likely to be motivated by chances to develop new, original ideas and approaches at work. This is likely to help you be seen as someone who often comes up with lots of creative ideas. However, at times, there may be a risk that your innovative ideas are seen as too far outside of the box. When sharing your ideas with others, try to make sure that you explain how and why your creative ideas reflect useful new ways of working.

Work Style

You are likely to be someone who follows through on their commitments and is seen as reliable. However, you are likely to be uncomfortable in situations when it may be more appropriate to leave some things you have committed to, to work on other tasks that might be more important. To help you feel most comfortable, consider prioritizing tasks based on their level of importance. That way, any unfinished tasks are less likely to impact your reliable reputation.

You are likely to be very comfortable questioning instructions and policies when you feel it could help you do better work. This tendency may assist you in situations where strictly following instructions and policies without question can lead to unintended consequences. However, some rules need to be followed even if they may be inconvenient or do not seem important, with deviations possibly leading to disastrous outcomes. Focus on understanding how the rules are important to help you be more comfortable following them.

Thinking Style

You are likely to be comfortable acting on things without the need for unnecessary consideration. This may mean that in some circumstances, you are quicker to both initiate and complete tasks compared to someone who spends much more time being overly cautious. This may be beneficial in low-risk situations. However, in important or complex situations, carefully considering relevant information can be crucial for avoiding potentially unfavorable outcomes. To do so, ensure you dedicate time specifically to considering risks and devote extra effort to being especially careful when completing your tasks.

You are likely to be very comfortable evaluating information and ideas critically. You should find this useful when considering the potential weaknesses in ideas and plans, which should mean that you are unlikely to overlook fundamental flaws. However, you may risk seeming unapproachable as others may feel that it is difficult to have their ideas and suggestions accepted by you without criticism. When providing feedback, consider adopting a balanced approach by giving a mix of the potential strengths as well as the limitations.

Interaction Style

You are likely to feel comfortable letting others be in the spotlight. This could help you to be seen as a team player. However, there may be times during which it could be helpful to distinguish yourself and stand out from others. When you are presented with an appropriate chance to do so, it may be beneficial to take that chance and attract attention to yourself at work.

You are likely to be very comfortable and enjoy socializing with a wide variety of people. This confidence is likely to be highly advantageous in networking or social situations or when you need to quickly develop rapport with someone. However, to avoid being perceived as too dominant, ensure that you allow adequate time for others to contribute to the conversation by pausing to give them time to say something or asking them direct questions.

Strengths & Potential Challenges

Strengths

- Your very high expectations of yourself should help you to achieve your challenging goals and aspirations.
- You are likely to be dependable and finish what you start.
- You are likely very confident talking to and building relationships with people, regardless of how well you know them.
- You are likely to find that thinking of original and highly innovative ideas comes very naturally for you.
- You will likely be comfortable questioning rules if you think it is necessary to do higher quality or more efficient work.

Potential Challenges

- You are likely to find it dissatisfying or demotivating if you do not achieve all your high expectations or difficult goals.
- You are likely to see it as necessary to finish the things you commit to, even if other tasks may be more important.
- At times, your social boldness may come across as being a bit dominant.
- Given your high creativity, others might find it difficult to follow your out-of-the-box thinking.
- You may find it a bit frustrating if you are required to follow procedures or instructions that you think are inefficient.
